Infosys is not an ideal LBO candidate, for several reasons:

Too large	At 422,800 Cr ($50bn+), very few PE firms could finance this
Net cash position :	LBOs work best on companies with stable, debt-serviceable cash flows and some existing leverage capacity. Infosys has negative net debt, meaning you are paying a premium for cash you don't need
Asset-light, low capex	Good for cash generation but LBOs typically target companies with hard assets that can be used as loan collateral. Banks are less comfortable lending against an IT services business
High payout ratio	Infosys pays out ~73% of earnings as dividends, meaning less retained cash to service new LBO debt
Debt burden post-close	The model shows debt barely gets paid down over 5 years (total debt stays 253,968 Cr, because interest consumes a large portion of free cash flow at 6x leverage

What makes the returns look attractive (22.4% IRR)?

- 1 Purely driven by EBITDA growth (7% revenue growth + margin expansion) and multiple arbitrage staying flat at 10x
- 2 If exit multiple compresses to 8x (common in IT sector re-ratings), IRR drops significantly
- 3 The return is not really coming from debt paydown (the traditional LBO value driver) which is a weakness
- 4 Interest on Senior Notes (12%) is being capitalised (PIK'd) rather than paid in cash, the balance grows from ₹84,560 Cr at entry to ₹149,023 Cr at exit. In a real transaction, senior notes would either be cash pay or explicitly structured as PIK with lender consent. This is a modelling simplification; in practice, the additional interest burden would further reduce bank debt paydown capacity and compress IRR.
